A black and white photograph showing a woman from behind, working at a sewing machine. The machine has 'SIERROS' and 'PLAY FAIR' printed on it. The background is slightly out of focus, showing other people in a factory or workshop.

“Fascinating and refreshingly radical”
(past student)

This course is an engaging introduction to the central role working people play in international development. The course explains key issues such as international development and globalisation, poverty, trade justice and labour migration. From the United Nation’s ‘Millennium Development Goals’ to the international trade union movement’s promotion of ‘Decent Work’, this course explores the global issues behind these agendas. It also addresses how, through trade union workplace action, in communities and internationally, workers can secure fairness and justice at work instead of being forced to choose between exploitation and starvation.

“Excellent help, support and encouragement”
(past student)

- Explore the experience of working people in a global context.
- Understand the role of trade unions in development.
- Recognise different kinds of solidarity actions.
- Help you work out what you can do to build interest and activism in your union.

“This course has made me see the world differently and I now realise just how true the saying “an injury to one is an injury to all” really is.”
(past student)

The course begins 19 January and takes around 30 hours over eight weeks. Click below for further information and to sign up for the course
